Three Canadians belong to one of the most striking language groups that are prevalent in the Alpine region: namely, those speakers speak Swiss German dialects, known and known. These speakers live in an area ranging from the Rhodane through Central Europe to the Alpine region, covering parts of Switzerland, Austria, Germany and northern France. The Alpine region is one of the most important linguistic and cultural regions in Europe, with speakers of several of the world's most important languages.

The second largest language family is Afroasiatic, which covers much of the region. Chadic, Berber, Cushitic and Semitic Afroasiatic languages range from northwest Mauritania through northern Senegal, western Africa, French Guiana, the Indian and the southern portions of the Pacific.

Current efforts at program development in the center, also supported by the EPA, are designed to help people in 1992 to improve their water quality. In 1992 we had a lot of help from the EPA in the way of improving the water quality, that had been passed through the water in the last 100 years. It's a lot of work.

Second chance for natives to learn language

by Colleen Conneff

Imagine not being able to communicate with your grandchildren in your mother tongue; you have lost or have not learned your first language. Perhaps a child born in the country absorbed from the other children in class, the entire youth in adulthood has never learned.

These realities are real in today's society. Communication and how, from the many years. The issue of an alternative form of a vocabulary of the future of education systems to meet the needs of native children.

"With virtually no formal or informal help in learning language, they are at a disadvantage as they grow up."

Chris Francis, who teaches an annual 10-week Ojibwa course in the Ojibwa Studies Centre at Saskatchewan, is one of many trying to bring native culture through language. The course, funded by Canada Employment and Immigration, is set up by the Saskatchewan Native Education Centre.

Francis says the program is helping the youth to improve their ability to communicate in language, as well as to provide a better understanding of native culture through language and culture. Francis would like to see the program expanded to include more native students in the province and to communicate, says Francis.

"The only similar course for native students in Saskatchewan was at PVHS in Victoria Public School, where both Ojibwa and Cree were offered until funding ceased."

Previously, Francis says, the focus of the course was on the history of the course. She says in the last few years the focus shifted to an emphasis on culture. Francis says the focus was on "great traditions from our native people." She says she spent time with native students, and she says she was proud to see them do so well.

She says the course has been successful because the students are so motivated.

Unfortunately, of 21 native languages, no more than 10 are in the range of the majority of the population. Francis says that in the last 100 years, many native languages have been lost, and she says she is proud to see them do so well.

European NHL invasion threatens Canadian players

As we slowly prepare to begin the 1993-94 season, there is a growing concern among the most discerning fans who are taking place in the story world of the National Hockey League.

European players' participation in the NHL has been a steady increase over the last few years, and it is expected that this trend will continue in the coming years. In fact, some fans have begun to wonder if the NHL is becoming too European.

Canadian fans often complain about the influx of European players, which has led to a steady decline in the number of Canadian players in the NHL.

Over the last few years, there has been a steady decline in the number of Canadian players in the NHL. This is due to a number of factors, including the influx of European players and the increasing number of Canadian players who are being drafted by European teams.
